

Elmer Pendell (1894-1982)

Until the 1930s, population experts the world over routinely concerned themselves as much with human quality as with human quantity. Then the political climate changed, and with it the tune that demographers were singing. One population man who wouldn't switch to a monotone was Elmer Pendell, a holder of the Purple Heart, the Distinguished Service Cross, and several advanced degrees, whose distinguished teaching career spanned five decades. Dr. Pendell died at his home in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, on March 18.

Many Instaurationists will best remember Pendell for his masterful study of "the biological basis for both the building and unbuilding of civilizations," entitled Why

Civilizations Self-Destruct (Howard Allen, 1977).

The book's main theme is that every advanced social order to date has tended to undermine natural selection (and thus eventually its own well-being) by protecting and even rewarding human weakness in all its many forms.

Pendell's readers are spared complete pessimism by a brilliant question-and-answer section which is in the book's final chapter. Here, the author offers "ways and means to stop the historic and hitherto unstoppable processes of social entropy." One intriguing remedy is a sperm bank program for proven geniuses. This discussion may have helped to inspire inventor

Robert Klark Graham's Repository for Germinal Choice, which, on May 23, announced the birth of its first eugenically conceived baby, the healthy, nine-pound daughter of an unidentified "eminent mathematician."

Pendell's other books include Population on the Loose (1951), The Next Civilization (1960), Sex Versus Civilization (Noontide Press, 1967), Rhymed Reminders (1970) and, with Guy Irving Birch, Population Roads to Peace or War (1945), which was revised as Human Breeding and Survival (1947). He also served on the Board of Directors of Birthright, Inc., a now defunct national organization which encouraged the sterilization of the unfit.

The Big Scare

Time (March 29, 1982) had a box detailing the destruction a one-megaton Russian H-bomb would do to Detroit if it were "exploded at 6,000 feet on a clear spring evening" over the center of the city. At 0-1 mile radius, Time prophesied, all buildings and practically every man, woman and child would be destroyed; at 1-2 mile radius, only a few reinforced buildings would still be standing and at least half the people would be gone; at 2-3 miles, 25% of the people would be dead and all homes would suffer severe damage; at 3-4 miles there would be "moderate structural damage" and "10% of the population could die, with 35% injured."

Now let's outloom Time and assume that everyone in the 0-3 mile radius would be annihilated and all buildings, including reinforced structures, destroyed. That represents an area of slightly more than 28 sq. mi. Next let's recall that the Kremlin is supposed to have a nuclear arsenal of 7,868 megatons contained in 8,040 warheads. If a one-megaton nuke can destroy all the people and buildings in an area of about 28 sq. mi., then 7,868 x 28 or 220,304 sq. mi. of the U.S. would be utterly destroyed if every one-megaton warhead were mounted on every Russian missile (land-based and submarine) and if every one of those Russian missiles, even those that could not possibly reach the U.S., somehow did reach the U.S. and land smack on target. This is a very generous estimate since the average Russian warhead is less than one megaton.

To continue the numbers game, the area of the U.S. is 3,618,467 sq. mi. When the 220,304 sq. mi. of total devastation produced by an all-out Russian attack is divided into the total area of the U.S., there emerges a figure of nearly 16. This means that under perfect conditions, if the Russians were willing to throw their entire nuclear stockpile at us in one fell swoop, if they were willing to strip down their nuclear defenses against China to zero and if the dubious accuracy of their guidance systems is not considered -- not to mention our interceptors -- a Russian nuclear attack could destroy 1/16 of the United States. (The total destruction scenario, by the way, has no place for radioactive fallout, since bombs exploded in the air for maximum destruction produce very little fallout.)

Yet in spite of this obvious arithmetic, all we hear these days in Time and in the press at large are doomsaying lamentations about total destruction, the end of civilization, the death of the planet, und so weiter.

What we are really hearing, of course, is the old liberal wind. When we take into account that the real destruction would probably be much less than that outlined above, since we have given Russian destructiveness every possible statistical break, it seems that the liberal wind is blowing hotter every day.

As a matter of fact, when the liberals, pacifists and appeasers are talking about civilization, just what are they referring to? And when they talk about the end of civilization, what do they mean by "end"? There are quite a few people in the U.S., particularly those who live in New York, Detroit, Newark and other darkening urban agglomerations, who believe that civilization in the U.S. has already ended. Isn't it rather tautological to talk about the end of the end?

And isn't it strange that the very people who are propagandizing for a nuclear freeze today (many of them really want the U.S. to disarm unilaterally) are the very same people who wanted us to share our atomic secrets with Russia when we had a nuclear monopoly and could have kept it by nuking any country which tried to make a nuclear bomb? Some of these people, those who could not wait, actually stole the secrets and handed them over to the Muscovites.

In the late 1940s, Americans who wanted to prevent nuclear proliferation by preemptive strikes against would-be bomb builders were called "fascists." Later, we were called warmongers when we called for an ABM system which would have destroyed or diverted incoming Russian missiles. Today, we are called "fascists" for trying to prevent Russian nuclear superiority. But those, of course, who built the bomb, and dropped the bomb on Japan, who wanted to give it to Russia and now demand a freeze, since Russia has as many or more bombs than we have, are called liberals.

And they will still be called liberals when, if Israel's security is ever seriously threatened, they quickly whistle a different tune and instruct us that nuclear war no longer means the end of the world, but has become a just and necessary end for the salvation and safety of God's chosen acres.

Calling Paul Revere

In Europe, one does not "study journalism"; one studies history, or science, or some other substantive field, and only slowly receives opportunities to show that one knows a thing or two. In America, all too often, journalism attracts the shallowest minds on university campuses, people all too capable of taking over the Hometown Blather and spending the next 50 years believing -- and relaying -- all the gas that comes through the syndicate pipelines.

A recent editorial in the Salem (Oregon) Statesman-Journal, entitled "Immigration plan is odious," had "journalism degree from Cow Tech" written all over it:

While we sympathize with the goal of having a standard identification card, we have no particular enthusiasm for a forge-proof card that everyone would have to show when he or she applies for a job. Social Security numbers have turned into a de facto national identification system, and that is troubling enough. The icy demand in too many grade B movies to "see your papers" rings in our ears.

The typical small-town journalist still sees America as a Pollyanna nation, inhabited by 225 million souls as dense and unimaginative as himself. The notion that Organized Meanies from Outside with Long-range Goals might take over some Hollywood studios and crank out hundreds of grade B movies in order to "ring" certain ideas inside his virginal ears is unintelligible to someone as rooted in the here-and-now and ignorant of past tragedy as he.

Someone should tell Salem -- that an estimated half-million people from tiny El Salvador alone are now camped illegally in America, mostly in California; that experts have determined that, without massive deterrence, more immigrants will come to America in the next 15 years than came between 1790 and 1970; that Secretary of State Alexander Haig has warned the National Governors Conference that the continued radicalization of Latin America will trigger a tidal wave of new refugees, "making the Cuban influx look like child's play"; that Ruben Bonilla, the president of the 100,000-member League of United Latin American citizens is crowing that, "After 50 years, we're still Mexicans first, then Americans"; in short, that all hell is being let loose on America.

The world is streaming into these parts like quicksilver. America's journalism students are responding like cold glue. They cite the wisdom of grade B movies, Superman comic books and Perry Mason novels in their editorials for a very good reason: it's the only thing most of them know.

Attitudinal Turnabout

The U.S. is "ignored, despised, reviled" at the U.N. Pravda didn't say this. Jeane Kirkpatrick, our U.N. ambassador, did. We used to have Chile and the Dominican Republic with us on most issues, she recently told interviewer Mike Wallace, but now even they are lost. "We're a country without a party."

Kirkpatrick went on to say that various U.N. delegates have expressed concern about the number of Jews in the American mission. The "whispers" she alluded to were coming from Western Europeans, not from Arabs and Third Worlders, and they were occasioned by three of her top five appointees: Kenneth L. Adelman, second in command; Charles M. Lichtenstein, deputy delegate; Carl S. Gershman, adviser. A fourth appointee is a Cuban refugee.

Speaking before the ADL's national executive committee a short time later, Kirkpatrick claimed that the language used in the U.N. resolution calling for the isolation of Israel went far beyond any previous remonstrances against member states -- including South Africa. She saw the resolution as "laying the groundwork" for the suspension or expulsion of Israel and warned of "serious consequences" for the world body if this inconceivable horror should take place. She quoted "Holocaust" survivor Tom Lantos, a congressman from California, as saying, "the Congress and the American people are sick and tired of financing the antics of the Libyas and Cubas of this planet."

The U.S. will pay 25% of this year's total U.N. budget of $753 million. This sum of $188 million falls rather short of the direct annual American subsidy of $3 billion for Israel's antics, and indirect subsidies are at least as large (special tax and tariff privileges, private gifts, secret deals and what not).

Mayor Edward Koch of Fun City is running for governor of his state on an anti-U.N. platform. He calls the international body a "cesspool" and a "den of iniquity," although the attendant diplomatic community, comprising 40,000 free-spenders, is one of his financially troubled city's major economic props. New York State's conservative Republicans, among them Representative Jack Kemp and Senator Alphonse D'Amato, are also campaigning on the Israel First ticket. Exclaims Mayor Koch: "If the U.N. would leave New York, nobody would ever hear of it again."

Yet it was the United Nations, at U.S. and Jewish prodding, that created Israel in 1948. In those days the world organization was the apple of Jewry's eye.

Frankenstein's monster is just adorable; Frankenstein's monster is not monstrous -- until it turns against Frankenstein.

Not-So-Democratic Party

The same people who promised Americans "more democracy" in the 1960s got cold feet when white survival advocates began winning Republican and Democratic primaries in the 1980s. So now they are marching us right back into the era of the "smoke-filled room."

On March 26, the Democratic National Committee (DNC) gave its final approval to new rules for the 1984 presidential nomination process. More than 500 elected and party officials, including nearly 200 congressmen, will be in the convention hall as uncommitted delegates. A move to make 350 DNC members automatic, unpledged delegates as well was ruled out of order by the party chairman, but may resurface later. Party power brokers are expected to control most of the huge new uncommitted bloc.

Darkhorse candidates like Jimmy Carter will now have to win a lot more primary votes to have a shot at the nomination. This latest development, combined with growing minority registration among Democrats, probably eliminates the last remote chance of electing a "White Firster" through that party. Since third parties rarely go anywhere in America, the most realistic hope for ending white decline lies with the Republican electoral process and through extrapolitical means.

Other DNC rule changes also serve minority bloc interests. States will again have the option of electing their delegates on a plurality basis. Thus, if Candidate X wins a plurality of 30% in a crowded field, he may again receive all 100% of the delegates at stake (in a given congressional district). This change, which was favored by "organization states" like New York, Illinois, Pennsylvania and Texas, exaggerates the influence of populous (i.e., more heavily minority) states. It was banned as recently as 1978 as a violation of the principle of proportional representation.

No Angel

Hardly anyone likes to play minor league baseball. The crowds are small, the pay is lousy, and the accommodations involve long bus rides between cheap motels. The Carolina League is an extremely competitive minor league, where coaches and managers say that one or two extra hits in clutch situations over the course of a long season often make the difference between a batter's moving on to fame and fortune, or staying put. Those same hits may end a pitcher's career.

Last August 19, Carolina League umpire Spook Jacobs, who knows some Spanish, heard a young catcher named Angel Rodriguez alerting some of the opposing batters to upcoming pitches. "Directa" meant a fast ball, and "curba" a curve. He also told them whether the pitch would be high or low, inside or outside -- and his tips were accurate. After the game, Jacobs spoke with officials, who confronted Rodriguez. The 20-year-old admitted passing signals, and was suspended for the last 11 days of the season, pending an investigation.

The five-month probe revealed that at least six of the league's eight umpires had heard Rodriguez pass signals to opposing batters. Umpire Chuck Morgan lamely explained, "I don't understand Spanish, but I did notice that every time Rodriguez would say a certain word . . . it would be the same type of pitch." Coleman Coffelt, who had umpired in the Gulf Coast League with Rodriguez in 1979, and in the South Atlantic League in 1980, reported having clearly heard the wayward Angel passing signals to Latin American players. "I told the skippers and they took him out of the games," Coffelt said. He saw the same thing happening again in the Carolina League last year but at first said nothing about it: "I figured it has been going on for three years and nothing happened, so I didn't do anything."

Among the 25 Hispanic players in the Carolina League last year, about eight figured in the investigation. Back home in Puerto Rico, Rodriguez changed his story, and claimed that he had misunderstood questions put to him last August 19 because of his poor English. Actually, he now said, he was trying to deceive his opponents.

"The integrity of the game is at stake in this," says Spook Jacobs. "If a batter knows where a pitch is going to be, that's half the battle. These pitchers have their careers on the line." On February 2, the verdict came in: a one-year suspension for Rodriguez, no penalties for the other Latin players, and -- worst of all -- no action against the Majority umpires who saw what was happening and never said boo. "He [Rodriguez] will have been punished enough," remarked one permissive official.

The Real Thing

The U.S. is loaded with "talking" revolutionaries. They publish pamphlets and manifestos oozing with insurrectionary vitriol, then switch off their word processors, go back to their seedy public housing pads and watch "Archie Bunker's Place" through a marijuana haze. Once in a rare while they climb up on a soapbox and utter a few imprecations against Reaganite bloodsuckers or, well protected by a safety belt of police, heroically throw rocks at a couple of Klansmen. Otherwise, revolution in this country remains prudently cool. The day when the proles charged the Pinkertons with their bare fists is long past.

Or is it? There is one group in the land that does emit an authentic proletarian odor. It is called ACORN (Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now). Composed almost entirely of Unassimilable Minority members, ACORN moves its riffraff into vacant houses where they squat and laugh at the law. Recently in Pittsburgh, after some hesitation, Mayor Caliguri summoned up enough courage to order the police to go in and remove ACORNites from a few houses. When Pittsburgh Councilwoman Michelle Madoff obligingly came to ACORN's defense, J.J. Doerschner, who had a house taken over by ACORN members, accused her of saying it was all right for the scofflaws to squat to their hearts' content. Madoff threatened to sue for libel.

ACORN is active in a few other American cities, and similar organizations have been squatting around Europe. Grabbing homes is a far more revolutionary act than grabbing gold neck chains and purses. We know from what mighty oaks grow. We should also know from what revolutions grow. The first storm signals are flying. A real, not a media, enemy is finally coming into sight.

Juvenile Mentality

How many times have we all heard young members of the liberal establishment referring to Southern political leaders two and three times their age as "good ole boys"? But only white men may be called "boys" under the present rules of the game. Ask the speaker of the Virginia House of Delegates, A.L. Philpott, 62. After meeting last April with the five blacks in the legislature, who agreed that he was "helpful," "very cordial," and, as always, a "gentleman," he was heard to casually remark, "I've never had any problems with those boys. They understand the system." This one word soon had every black politician in Virginia yapping in unison. The only black in the state Senate called it evidence of a "magnolia mentality" which would force blacks to launch their own independent candidate for the U.S. Senate. One black delegate called upon Governor Chuck Robb and other Democratic party leaders to "publicly and viciously" criticize Philpott. No one listened when white Delegate C. Hardaway Marks, 61 years old, observed that the speaker always called him "boy."

Black Questers

A report from an Instaurionist film buff.

"Quest for Fire" is supposed to be a serious film about how prehistoric man first learned to make, and make the most of, fire.

I had to laugh.

There were three racial types portrayed in this dawn-of-man period: monkey men, post-monkey men and Negroes. The monkey men, cannibals who enjoyed boiled Negro delicacies, were wanton barbarians with no hint of human intelligence or individuality. They were endlessly at war with the post-monkey men, who had a talent for independent thought and were not a faceless mass. It was this latter group that was questing for fire.

But guess who had the secret of fire already well in hand? Negroes! Guess who lived in well-ordered villages instead of trees and caves? Negroes! Guess who had a highly developed language, while the lighter-skinned brutes could only grunt? Right again.

So it was only fitting that the kindly blacks (who like Jerry Brown wouldn't hurt a fly) taught the pre-whites how to keep the fires burning. And it was only fitting that the pre-historic Negro heroine would offer herself to the bumbling pre-white and initiate him into another secret that also produces flames.

Yes, I had to laugh, though not as hard as I would have liked to. I was sobered by the thought of the subliminal damage such deliberate distortions of the past might have on the impressionable young audience.

Just a Perfect Friendship

Jerry Paris, the producer of ABC-TV's "Happy Days," is a millionaire Hollywoodian ex-actor who claims to be an old and "very close" friend of Ronald Reagan. Why, he made three movies with Ronnie, including "Bedtime for Bonzo"! Even after his old pal became president, he was invited to a joke-cracking private session with Ronnie at the former Reagan home in Pacific Palisades, where Paris himself lives.

Recently Paris gave a talk to the students of St. Petersburg (Florida) Junior College in which he, a Jew, explained that his half-Jewish wife, Ruth, had gone to school with Nancy Reagan. There Mrs. Paris had learned firsthand that Nancy hated Jews. . . . This is a fact. Also blacks. Openly. I'm going to give you the low-down. I don't pull any punches. . . . She would kill every black she could find.

Nice friend, that Jerry! Nice president, to have such friends! Will Ronnie now invite Jerry to the ranch for another friendly chat so he can personally apologize for having such a bigoted wife?

One trouble with Jerry Paris's story is that other Jerry. If Nancy really hates Jews so much, why did she choose Jerry Zipkin (Instaurion, March 1981) above all other American males to be her constant escort? Moreover, why did Nancy go to Hollywood and get into movies in the first place? If you don't like polar bears, you don't move to the North Pole. And why was she so hep on moving to Washington? If you hate blacks all that much, you don't move to America's blackest city.

Dr. Onestone Contradicted

Einstein's General Theory of Relativity has become part of the canon, not only of modern physics but of modern life. In some ways it belongs more to the realm of theology than science. As Instauration has shown in previous issues, our modern mentors simply won't entertain the idea that Einstein could be wrong. An atheist in the Middle Ages had more chance to be heard than an anti-Einsteinian in the mid-20th century, the high tide of anti-Nazism. Einstein, the media instructs us, was not only a genius; he was a Jew, a humanitarian and a hero for all seasons, a liberal with just the right touch of Zion, a grandfatherly pre-hippie who refused to wear socks and who let his hair grow decades before the appearance of the Beatles. So sacrosanct was he that no one dared criticize him for having a soft place in his heart for Stalin, for deserting his first wife and son (who spent a great deal of his life in deep psychoanalysis) and for writing a letter to Roosevelt that kicked off the atomic bomb project. Bombfather simply could do no wrong.

Although Einstein's General Theory of Relativity has no correspondence with physical reality and is basically a complicated equation designed to account for the gravitational mysteries of physics, it has been hailed as gospel ever since Sir Arthur Eddington "confirmed" it during a total eclipse in 1919.

Now along comes Prof. Henry Hill of the University of Arizona to say that the inexplicable advance in the precession of Mercury's orbit, which the sacred Theory is supposed to explain, is explicable by Newtonian physics. The sun, says Hill, after years of studying Old Sol, has a core that rotates six times faster than the surface. Because of its spin rate, the core flattens out at the top and bottom, which in turn has a direct effect on the sun's gravitational pull. Since Mercury is the closest planet to the sun, its orbit is measurably affected and its precession rate is increased by 1.7%, which fits as well with the facts as Einstein's theory.

So perhaps all the mysterious numbers, all the arcane tensors and other mathematical claptrap were for nought. A good old Western experimental scientist using the tried and true methods of Western science (the experiment before the theory, the observation before the inference) has come up with an explanation for Mercury's strange behavior that makes sense, not nonsense.

So the nimbus of another modern saint is losing some of its glow. Freud and Marx are still worshipped, but their congregation consists largely of cranks and nuts, although many of these cranks and nuts still hold high academic and political offices. Boas is still the apostle of the equalitarian fanatics, but his pulpit is getting shaky, what with the devastating attacks of Arthur Jensen, Konrad Lorenz and Edward Wilson.

Attending a scientific meeting in New York after he questioned Einstein's General Theory, Professor Hill was warned, "He better have it right." Indeed, he better. Remember what happened to Galileo.

When and When Not to Shoot

Under New York's laws on self-defense, you are entitled to fight back when attacked, but not to excess. If someone is trying to punch you, you may preventively punch him, but if you react more strongly, you -- not your assailant -- are the criminal. If someone comes at you with a knife, you are allowed to shoot only if you are unable to retreat. The "duty" of retreat means that you may not join a fray on equal terms if you can escape unharmed. Exceptions apply to the crimes of murder, kidnapping, rape, armed robbery and sodomy. There you may blast away to your heart's content -- and no one except maybe the gay lobby will give you any grief.

If you are defending personal property in New York, you are generally permitted to use only physical force, not "deadly physical force." Shooting an unarmed man who is stealing your car will get you manslaughter. On the other hand, if an unarmed prowler is inside your house, you may use your gun and the legal beavers will probably back you up to the point of keeping you out of jail. But don't count on it.

Lincoln's Warts

A University of Dallas professor named M.E. Bradford, considered the front-runner for chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, probably lost the post because his carefully documented findings on our first Republican president clashed with the myth.

Columnist George Will, who "reveres" Lincoln and still "smolders with indignation" at the uppitness of Southerners who only wanted to go on their own way, labeled Bradford "unfit for office" because he had called attention to Lincoln's Cromwellian and Bonapartist attributes. Bradford replied:

Most of [Will's] quotations from my work on Lincoln are reflections of academic commonplaces -- the books and essays of Edgar Lee Masters, Donald W. Riddle, Willmoore Kendall, Edmund Wilson, Gottfried Dietze and . . . Frank Meyer. My contribution to the critique has been an analysis of Lincoln's rhetoric, an idiom that contributed to the deaths of 600,000 American boys. I have also spoken of Lincoln's use of troops to win elections, the graft of his administration, his abuse under the war powers of political opponents in the North, his claims to intimacy with the divine will . . . and his willingness to waste Northern lives . . .

Even great admirers of Lincoln, like Henry Clay Whitney, conceded major faults:

This was one of the most uneven, eccentric and heterogeneous characters. One of the most obvious of Mr. Lincoln's peculiarities was his dissimilitude of qualities, or inequality of conduct, his dignity of deportment and action, interspersed with streaks of frivolity and inanity; his high aspirations and achievement, and his descent into the primitive vales of listlessness, and the most ridiculous buffoonery.

Mass Murders and Mini Murders

Just as mestizo writer Luis Marin, a Guatemalan immigrant, was being convicted (and then unconvicted) in White Plains, New York, of setting the fire which swept through a local Stouffer's Inn in 1980, killing 26 whites (most of them corporate executives), the case of mestizo labor boss Juan Corona was resurfacing in Sutter County, California. Marin allegedly "murdered up" in socioeconomic terms, while Corona "murdered down," by slashing 25 winos and wanderers to death. Corona's victims, by the way, were described by the media as "Anglos."

Marin was found guilty in April by a Westchester County jury which deliberated long and carefully. Then Judge Lawrence N. Martin, Jr., invoked a little-known point of law to overrule its verdict. The county district attorney called the intercession "a perversion of the criminal justice system" and vowed to appeal.

Corona was convicted in 1973, while gangs of Chicano militants shouted for his release. Now a defense team headed by one Michael Mendelson is arguing that Corona's crazy homosexual brother, Natividad -- conveniently missing -- really did it all. Since Corona is indigent, California taxpayers will pay both sets of legal bills, which could come to more than $4 million.

Hollywood Heresy

How are these for teaching credentials? Doctorate in classical history, six years' teaching experience at Bogota University, Colombia; active in the 1956 Hungarian uprising; imprisoned and tortured by Soviet interrogators; formerly hosted a Hungarian-language radio show in California.

Quite a record for a high-school teacher anywhere in this day, even at ritzy North Hollywood High School.

Yet Dr. George Ashley, 54, was abruptly transferred a few months ago to Polytechnic High School in the boondocks town of Sun Valley, and local Jewish leaders want him ousted from the Los Angeles school system altogether. His crime was to express doubts, based on his own first-hand experience, about the nature and extent of the persecution of Jews during World War II.

Ashley (his naturalized name) watched Budapest's Jews leading unhindered though somewhat restricted lives until 1945. The deportations to labor camps were mostly from small towns. After the Soviet invasion of Hungary, Ashley saw Hungarian soldiers summarily executed for alleged war crimes. One friend was executed solely because a Jewish woman accused him of murdering her husband. A few days later the husband turned up alive.

Ashley tells students about the things he has seen and challenges them to be inquisitive. This is unacceptable to people like Jewish Anti-Defamation League attorney Robert Glasser: "If anything, we are most upset because there are so few Jews at Poly. At least at North Hollywood we could keep an eye on him."

School board member Roberta Weintraub warns that Ashley is being closely monitored, adding, "I don't think that's good enough, but that's all we can do." Ms. Weintraub was previously known as an anti-busing crusader -- but only after Jewish neighborhoods were added to the busing program.

When Ashley became anxious for his job, he called his union, the United Teachers of Los Angeles. The administrator just laughed at him and said he was crazy if he doubted the Holocaust. The union, which is about 90% Jewish, failed to return his subsequent calls.

Was Davidoff the Falkland Fuse?

The British-Argentine confrontation actually began last March when a scrap metal dealer named Constantino Davidoff and his 43 workmen hoisted the Argentine flag over the tiny settlement of Leith in the South Georgia Islands, a dependency of the Falklands. Although carrying Argentine passports, they had been authorized by London to dismantle the old whaling station there. When British scientists reported Davidoff's caper, however, the HMS Endurance was sent down to evict him. The Argentine Navy responded by sending the warship Bahia Paraiso to protect Davidoff and his men. On March 30, news from London suggested that two submarines had left Gibraltar for the South Atlantic. On April 2, Argentina preempted their arrival with an invasion. By April 5, nearly two-thirds of the British fleet was setting sail for Portsmouth.

"Malvinas," Spanish for the Falklands, is derived from the French, "Isles Malouines," so named from a stay there in 1706-14 by sailors from St. Malo, Brittany. Two years after a short-lived French colony had been founded, Commodore John Byron took formal possession for England in 1766. This claim went unchallenged until 1820, when the newly independent Argentine Republic established a cattle ranch on the islands. Then, according to Samuel Eliot Morison (1974):

Trouble ensued between the Argentine gauchos and American sealers from Stonington, Conn., in consequence of which President Jackson ordered U.S.S. Lexington [under command of Silas Duncan] to clear out the offenders; he did so in 1832, deporting to Buenos Aires all the gauchos, who were nothing loath, having had no pay for over a year. Just at that time, when the Falklands were temporarily unoccupied, the British moved in, and there they have stayed. The Argentine Republic is still trying to get the islands back.

One of the greatest battles in naval history, the Battle of the Falklands, was fought in the area in December 1914. In one day the Royal Navy destroyed German naval power in the Southern Hemisphere.

By 1957 the Falklands enjoyed virtual self-government. The Argentine claim to sovereignty was rejected by the International Court of Justice in 1955 and by the United Nations in 1965. Until April 2, 1982, any Argentine visiting the Falklands had to show his return ticket on arrival.

No Dough for the PLO

When the media noised it about that one Fred Sparks, a newspaper man, had left $25,000 to the PLO, the faithful held up their hands in horror. What? An American reporter leaving money to those Holocaust-copying, Arabian nightmarish terrorists? Tax-deductible money may flow by the billions to the overflowing coffers of Israel. No problem. But valuta of any kind to the representatives of the Palestinian homeless? No way. So the ADL leaped into the fray with some ad hoc litigation and tied up the bequest. If the legal precedent is hard to come by, the ADLers may be sure to invent one.

But there's an ironic and mysterious twist to the affair. Although the info was omitted from the first news reports, Fred Sparks was Jewish. On top of that, he had written some spitefully anti-Arab pieces for his employer, the Newhouse newspaper chain, and for other journals.

So what was Fred Spiegelstein (alias Fred Sparks) trying to say in his will? Was he atoning for his sins? Playing a practical joke on his racial cousins? Who will ever know?

But what is known is that the enigmatic soul of Sparks will spend a long time up there or down there before that $25,000 ever gets deposited to the account of Yasser Arafat.

Impure Gentile

Whether or not he is rotting away in some Soviet Gulag, Raoul Wallenberg, the alleged rescuer of hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews toward the end of World War II, has become the latest Holocaust martyr, a sort of male Anne Frank, and the hero of a new nonfiction (fiction?) bestseller called The Righteous Gentile by John Bierman (Viking Press, 1981).

Raoul may have been righteous, but was he really a Gentile? He was the great-grandson of one Michael Bendicks, who arrived in Stockholm in 1780 and opened a jewelry store. He later became a usurer to the royal family, married a Swedish girl and converted to Lutheranism. Michael Bendicks, we are told in Atlantic (Nov. 1980, p. 40), was a German Jew.

The Most Dangerous Habit

One way to stop one of the deadliest habits of modern times, TV addiction, is to make a log of the programs being viewed and the time spent viewing them. Some Americans, usually women, are glued to the tube 11 or more hours each day. After the log, which makes the addict aware of his or her addiction, a metronome should be plugged into the TV. The loud ticking off of the seconds while the set is on warns the addict of how much time is being wasted on the tube.

"The important point," says Leonard Jason, a professor of psychology at De Paul University, "is to develop some sort of activity, some intervention, that is incompatible with passivity. TV watching is the ultimate passivity. Get people doing something -- anything -- and they'll stop watching TV."

The average American home has a TV set on more than 6 hours a day. American children watch 20,000 hours of TV before they're 16. The average viewer's brain waves enter a pre-sleep phase within 30 seconds of switching on the set, an alpha-wave pattern which itself can be addictive.

In many ways, TV is worse than drugs. The dope addict isn't given a cram course on the glories of liberalism and race-mixing while he sniffs his cocaine or dribbles heroin into his veins.

Cholly Bilderberger

An article in the May Instauration raises some compelling questions. Entitled "Getting Out of the Rut," it considers the effects of an accelerated collapse of the U.S., with the whites driven into enclaves:

From the rump all-white nation, greatly reduced in size and numbers, might come the resurgence of the old pioneer spirit, a burst of creative energy that would build a shining new civilization on the ruins of the past. As such, it might act both as a magnet and a tonic for the decaying white nations of Western Europe and Australia. Anglo-Canada might even merge with the new America, which would offer a haven for besieged Northern Europeans in South Africa

The smart Majority strategy would be not to oppose this trend, but to accelerate it. Our future depends on whether we will have the strength to survive chaos once it explodes. The longer we put off the day of reckoning, the fewer our chances of survival. The quicker the country ignites, the better equipped we will be to put out the fire. Half measures, such as a more prudent economic policy, a temporary dampening of inflation, a renewal of détente, tighter immigration laws, would only postpone the crisis, delay it until such time as we may be too debilitated to meet it successfully.

Ironically, the future of the white race everywhere may depend on the speed of America's decline. If the Majority member realizes too late that he is slated for extinction, his extinction will be certain. The man who is in a fight for his life has little hope of winning and even less to gain if he waits until he is on his deathbed to put up a fight.

This analysis challenges the basic premise of such white resistance as does exist at present: that the only solution to America's woes is to work through the so-called democratic process. This is the premise on which all concerned Americans in government operate. It is also the premise on which very nearly all concerned Americans operate in private — so long as they try to work inside the system, they have discharged their obligations.

It is on the near-total acceptance of this premise that concerned politicians and pundits propose courses of action inside the system, and ask for support; and that concerned citizens respond with money and time and effort. It is on this premise that what is left of American — and Northern European — resistance to disintegration is built.

If the premise is wrong, it is because it is unworkable. The process of disintegration is moving faster than the counter-effort to stop and contain it. The countereffort can only produce a delay of the inevitable. And, as the article points out, such a delay may be fatal. When the inevitable collapse finally does occur, whites will very likely be too debilitated to survive it. Working inside the system is revealed as a vast and destructive charade.

There are situations in ordinary life in which it is disastrous to insist on following a failing policy. Men must abandon worthless coal mines, bankrupt businesses, dry wells and all other unworkable dreams. Those who don't are considered lunatics. The same judgment is eventually applied to nations and races which pursue failing policies. The only difference — and it is, unfortunately, a profound one — is that it takes so much longer for the lunacies of nations and races to be admitted and judged. A single man insisting on an unworkable policy fails in a short time in an isolated, observable catastrophe. A nation or race insisting on an unworkable policy takes forever to fail in an all-embracing catastrophe, which involves all the observers.

If concerned Americans are wrong in trying to effect changes by means of the "democratic process," because those changes are always inadequate half measures which only prolong the agony and debilitate their own energies, then they are immoral Americans as well. Willy-nilly, they have become the allies of the very forces of darkness they are trying to defeat. They are causing more trouble than if they did nothing.

If the "smart Majority strategy would be not to oppose this trend [to collapse] but to accelerate it," then the stupid strategy would be to do just the opposite and oppose acceleration. It is on this point that morality as well as intelligence turns. In my experience, no one in a position of any responsibility in this country is urging acceleration of collapse. For anyone in public life to do so would be extremely impolitic, of course, but no one does so in private, either, except in a casual, joking fashion. Does this mean that everyone in a position of responsibility is either stupid, immoral or both? And if it doesn't mean any of those things, what does it mean?

In the years leading up to the American Revolution, colonial leaders were intelligent enough — and moral enough — to welcome the acceleration of collapsing relations with England as a necessary part of their strategy. They could not say it baldly in public, naturally, but they could, and did, say so in private. They welcomed each English administrative error, even when those errors caused them and their countrymen financial hardship and even loss of life. They wanted to accelerate the process of severance; they didn't want to wait forever. They aided the process; they assisted the inevitable.

Of course, their acceleration of collapse was based on the agreed goal of national independence. Without the goal, it is doubtful that they could have or would have become involved in such acceleration. It is equally doubtful that we can heed the call "not to oppose this trend, but to accelerate it" without an agreed goal. In our time, that would be to regain control of our lives and destinies no matter the cost. Such a goal is, again, a form of independence — a far more basic form, incidentally, than the one for which the American Revolution was fought. We could have survived — we might even have thrived — under the Crown; we cannot survive the present oppression, which cuts at the very quick of our being.

If it is moral as well as intelligent to accelerate America's decline, how can that be done? Ideally, a concerned individual would slowly join with others equally concerned, and equally dedicated to regaining control of life and destiny. This would be an organic rather than an intellectual movement, flowing naturally and gradually increasing in numbers and force. By its very existence, it would accelerate collapse.

The moment anyone believes that "the quicker the country ignites, the better equipped we will be to put out the fire," he becomes a force for ignition. Even though nothing in his outward life ostensibly changes, he has added to acceleration, no matter how infinitesimally. Fitzgerald's definition of America as "a willingness of the heart" is quite accurate psychologically; what continues to hold this country together — insofar as it does function — are the tattered remains of that willingness, that decency, that desire to go beyond the boundaries of the known. The commitment of the collective willing heart to the American way is the core of our society's being. If that willing heart withdraws its commitment to the American way, even in its secret recesses, and instead commits itself to the end of the American way because it sees that way has become hopelessly corrupt, then that way cannot survive. Since the collective willing heart is an aggregate, any individual subtraction counts. Enough subtractions guarantee ignition.

Even if they understand that, many concerned people will still ask, "But then what? What would we do? There must be more to accelerating collapse than withdrawing the commitment of my 'willing heart' from the American way. Give me specifics." Specifics could be discussed, but it would be putting the cart before the horse; at this point such a discussion only obscures the central question of commitment. To paraphrase "Form follows function": "Action follows commitment." If enough Americans were committed to regaining control of their lives and destinies, nothing could prevent that commitment from bursting into the open by means of very definite specifics. It is of paramount importance to understand that the shift in commitment comes first, and is indispensable.

At the present time, very nearly all concerned Americans are more frightened at the prospect of being alienated from the remains of the American way than they are determined to save themselves and their descendants. The fear of alienation is a powerful force, inextricably bound up with patriotism, honor, loyalty and other desirable characteristics. It can only be overcome by courage rising from the desire for survival, and the passion for fulfillment of the self, family and race. To date, the fear has been stronger than the courage, and — as the Instauration article noted — it is wishful thinking to assume that this inversion will not continue.

It is an omnipresent inversion in America, which means that the rare individual who sees the situation and is strong enough to accept alienation, is thwarted because he can find no others with whom to join. He must live like an outsider in his own country, and be skillful enough to mask that condition. Like James Joyce, his weapons are silence, exile and cunning, and he can do no more than watch and wait for others to come to their senses. Even then, he must be extremely cautious, and not reveal himself without an equal commitment from others.

His only amusement — and he must have some fun in his alienation or give up — is sardonic and isolated, because he lives by completely transposed values. He does not deplore the Kennedys, for example, but welcomes them as wholly destructive, and hence desirable accelerators. He extends the same silent welcome to rock musicians, prime-time TV, and each and every other diseased symptom. He applauds rampant blacks, proliferating Hispanics, befuddled Reagans, blubbery Meeses, insolent William Safires, simpering Ben Bradlees, and preposterous William Styrons. He can hardly — but he does! — keep a straight face at any aspect of the seamless, ludicrous shambles that is contemporary America. To him, the repulsive Jewish comedian is always only one side of the gruesome comedy: the other is the slack-jawed Nordic or quasi-Nordic watching that comedian on television and smiling appreciatively at such wonderful entertainment. To him, it is all one stew: Harvard and Andy Warhol and Alexander Haig and Norman Mailer and Stansfield Turner and Frank Sinatra and Jim Baker and chicken tacos and video games and the White House and Harlem and Des Moines . . . everything and everyone, gathered together in a single gigantic canoe headed toward an equally gigantic waterfall.

"More!" he says to himself. "More and more and more. We haven't had Ted Kennedy yet. How about Richard Pryor for president? Or Jane Fonda? Or Cesar Chavez? How about legalized drugs? How about 'anti-defamation' laws with real teeth? How about a Nobel Prize for Jerry Lewis? How about 150,000 students at the University of Michigan? How about a year-round pro football season? How about a 700-foot-high copper and stainless steel monument to John Lennon? How about nine-foot basketball players? How about four computers in every home? How about making Jerusalem the capital of Idaho? How about bank failures? How about a stock market collapse? How about farmers walking away from their tractors? How about mass starvation? How about enough firepower to produce fifty million corpses? . . .

"And how about paraphrasing Lincoln's Second Inaugural Address to read: Yet, if God wills that this nonsense continues until all the wealth piled by the coward's 250 years of unchallenged materialism shall be sunk, and until every drop of dignity drawn by the lash of the oppressor shall be paid by another drawn by the sword, as was said 3,000 years ago, so still it must be said, 'The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.'? With that sentiment always in mind, I shall view what is now and what shall come — what must come — with equanimity, knowing that if it must come I must be strong enough to accept it, and look on it as deserved and just."

Ponderable Quote

Most slaves . . . were not kidnapped by whites but were prisoners of war sold by African potentates and traders to agents of European slaving enterprises residing in coastal enclaves. The African side of the trade, with few exceptions, was under indigenous control and did not constitute an early phase of white colonization. The normal relation between black and white on the west coast of Africa was what [the author] calls a "landlord-stranger" relationship, with Europeans in the subordinate role.

Review of James A. Rawley's
The Transatlantic Slave Trade
(N.Y. Times Book Review, November 1, 1981)

Notes from the Sceptred Isle - John Nobull

Rose Wilder Lane's Discovery of Freedom: Man's Struggle Against Authority, is a seminal work for American conservatives. It was first published in 1943, and republished in 1972.

You might think that the title of the work tells us all we need to know about it, but it contains much of value mixed up with nonsense and inaccurate history. I regard it as worthwhile to disentangle the various strands which the authoress has intertwined with all the assiduity of the black kitten in Alice Through the Looking-glass.

Her thesis is that the American tradition represents freedom, while the Old World, with some kind words for England and (less enthusiastically) the fringes of Western Europe, represents authoritarianism. She argues that there have been three main attempts to release human energies from the chains of authority: in ancient Israel, in Islam and in modern America. Universal hostility towards the Jews is explained away by claiming that Jewish libertarianism makes other people afraid, although one wonders whether the Jews are quite so pleased with her summary of their situation in ancient Egypt at the time of Joseph: "It seems that they became a rich and highly privileged class, having a pull at court with a clever kinsman who was reducing the Egyptians to slavery." But since "civilization depends upon religion," she feels that a bow towards the People of the Book is obligatory.

She next turns her attention to Islam, which she describes as "the first scientific civilization," by contrast with "the stagnation of Europe which is called the Dark Ages." Islam is given high marks for institutionalizing washing (a tradition really handed down from the Romans), for grasping the concept of zero (really transmitted from Sanskrit India), and for inventing the sextant and magnetic compass (though the lodestone had been known from very early times). Mohammed is credited with the invention of trench warfare (well known to Caesar), and silk is looked upon as an Islamic invention (actually Chinese). She regards Islamic civilization as having flourished for no fewer than eight centuries (there is no mention of the shattering effect of the 13th-century Mongol invasion), and she ascribes the decline of Islam, which she dates between the 15th and 17th centuries, to a new tendency to think of God as an authoritarian principle. Yet this was the very time when Ottoman civilization was at its most brilliant.

Some of the points she makes in favour of Islam are justified. Dissection did make considerable strides in Muslim countries at a time when it was forbidden by the Church in Europe. The Saracenic pigeon post was both quick and efficient. No doubt Muslim universities did benefit from Mohammed's notion that organisation corrupts knowledge. Damascene silks and steel were superior to those of Europe, and remained so for a very long time. But the authoress goes too far when she claims that the Saracens invented the idea of the gentleman, which "especially impressed the English" and is "still producing perhaps the finest class of human beings on earth today, the men and women of the British ruling class. It is an ideal which permeated all of American life." This is a flattering passage, but extremely anachronistic for 1943, when the English ruling class had already been undermined and when New Deal America hardly reflected gentlemanly ideals.

Mrs. Lane seems never to have read Tacitus, and gives the ancient Germans no credit for their love of freedom. For her, the Germans are pagans, with a typically pagan reverence for authority. Luther's reformation shows the same spirit. Yet by implication she makes precisely the opposite point when she explains that the Germani were defeated by the Romans because they only united in time of war. Of course, there has come to be a certain element of truth in her charges where modern Germany is concerned, because the Alpine type, which makes up about a third of the German population, really does revere authority. But to blame the Germans for Karl Marx is going a bit far, especially in view of her admiration for the Jews as a separate people. She describes the dropping of bombs "from Hamburg to Tokyo" as inspired by the first shot at Lexington (tantum religio potuit suadere malorum), and reaches the edge of hysterics when she tries to define the character of Hitler.

Mrs. Lane's attitude towards the feudal system is ambivalent. She feels that it combined authority (bad) with "the knowledge that men are free" (good). She even quotes Hilaire Belloc, who called feudalism, "a civilization which was undoubtedly the highest and best our race has known, comfortable to the instinct of the European, fulfilling his nature, giving him that happiness which is the end of man." She agrees that feudalism was "the most perfect social system in history," but implies that it broke down for that very reason. In the same way, she rejects G.K. Chesterton's "intolerant trumpets of honour, that usher with iron laughter the coming of Christian arms."

Indeed, by contrast with Islam, "the fanatic Catholic Europeans" get plenty of stick. The Gothic hidalgos of Spain are referred to as "a few Spanish Catholics remaining in the mountains, not worth conquering," and the Reconquest of Spain is represented as significant only in so far as it let in a flood of Saracenic energy. Well, the expulsion of the Moriscos does seem to have had a deleterious effect on Spanish agriculture, and the razing of the Moorish baths was a bad thing by any standards, but she omits to mention that Spain's most brilliant century, the sixteenth, occurred after the Moors (and Jews) had been expelled. As for the cultural achievements of Milan and Venice, she ascribes them to their contacts with Islam. Yet there was no Milan and no Venice in the Muslim world.

Rose Wilder Lane is much better on the United States, largely because she is better acquainted with its history. She rightly regards American inventiveness as part of the individualist tradition going back to Roger Bacon, and she sees private property as basic to freedom (as it is, after population has built up beyond a certain point). She perceives that the American Constitution, as originally devised, exists "to limit and restrain and check and hinder American government." She admits, however, the ruler of a pure democracy swiftly becomes a tyrant (as we should be aware from the experience of the Greeks). She also makes an interesting distinction between the intellectual theorists of the 18th century Enlightenment and the American settlers who mainly read the Bible. The former were looking around for a benevolent despot who would bring in the Age of Reason, would make men live according to Natural Laws and would then "wither away," since he was no longer necessary in such a virtuous society. The settlers were more practical.

Mrs. Lane contrasts the Roman Peace, with its planned economy supporting the feckless on the taxes of the productive, to the sparing, laissez-faire attitude of Elizabeth I, who would not even pay for the ammunition used against the Armada. Her judgement of George III bears quoting and could apply equally well to Philip II of Spain: George III "toiled from candlelight to candlelight to prepare himself for governing He curbed English industry and commerce by more than two thousand new regulations." She sees that only smugglers can prevent starvation under monopolies planned for the good of the poor, because the controllers of planned economies have no means of knowing real costs, which therefore increase exponentially.

Rose Wilder Lane was writing at a time when it was becoming obvious that America was the most powerful country in the world. She gave reasons as to how this phenomenon had arisen, and many of them are justifiable. She did not regard progress as inevitable, but she expected it to be unlimited because the principles of Americanism were being disseminated far and wide. She gloried in the superior productivity of the American worker, and believed that poverty would be abolished. The last words of her book are, "The time is coming when Americans will set the whole world free." It did not happen. Why?

The answer to that question will also be found in her book. She lays stress on the alleged poor quality of the early settlers of the United States, not taking into account either the dedication of the pioneers or the hard circumstances which killed off the weak. Principles alone cannot explain their success. But alas, she really believes that principles alone are enough to ensure success. She proclaims that "all men are brothers, of one blood, of one human race," and that "in the human world there is no entity but the individual person." For her, as for so many others, Americanism has nothing to do with "races, creeds, classes or nations." In fact, she makes the typically Nordic mistake of assuming that everybody else has the same aspirations as she has. It is akin to the pathetic fallacy of the Romantics, which led them to imagine that Nature somehow sympathised with men. She fails to realise that individualism is not typical of the human race as a whole, but is confined to Mediterranean and Nordics, becoming harmful if carried to excess. Nor has she understood that the freedom which the Nordic needs is not only incomprehensible but actually hateful to people of other races.

In March 1978, three "penniless" Israeli immigrants, JOE, AVI and RALPH NAKASHE, started the Jordache Company, which specializes in "designer" jeans and ran ads featuring a topless white female model posing with a topless black male. In 1979 each Nakashe brother earned $114,000; in 1980 each took home $875,000; in 1981, $1,000,000. In 1982 each hopes to pocket $1,150,000, but they may have a little trouble with the IRS about corporations paying excessive salaries to avoid taxes on profits. Says Joe Nakashe in his Tel Aviv accent, "We need the increase; we know what inflation is doing." Jeans were originally developed by Levi Strauss, a racial cousin of the Nakashes, for Western working men. By making the same "Levis" for women and charging four or five times more, the Nakashes and their rival, Calvin Klein, another Jewish clothier, whose ads featured the pubescent derrière of Brooke Shields, have milked millions upon millions of dollars out of fashion-sappy American females.

Canada. They said it couldn't happen, and it happened. Now they say it didn't really mean anything. Last February, a drawling Alberta oil scout named Gordon Kesler became the first Western Canada separatist elected to office -- by a landslide. The voting behavior of the Olds-Didsbury Riding, situated about 50 miles north of boomtown Calgary, had the establishment politicians muttering from Vancouver Island to Labrador. Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau blamed "racist, hateful" propaganda by unnamed federal and provincial officials for the Alberta legislature's new face.

At its convention in Red Deer, Alberta, last November, the Western Canada Concept (WCC) called for "independence for Western Canada," one nation with one language, an elected judiciary, the right to bear arms, and uncontrolled world prices for Western resources.

There are several differences between the WCC and René Levesque's separatist Parti Québécois. The WCC's "Creed" is made up of one-liners like "We promise to stop compulsory metrification." Kesler's campaign anthem was a country and western ballad. Quebec separatism, on the other hand, springs from café-haunting intellectuals willing -- indeed happy -- to give long hours to ideological palaver. Kesler, 36, who "sounds Albertan to the marrow of his lanky bones," is a soft-spoken cowboy who prefers wrestling steers at rodeos in his spare time. His supporters tend to be older and rural people in a region whose cities are being transformed by Third World immigration -- a human stream which the brash French chauvinists have steered away from Quebec.

A recent Gallup Poll asked Canadians whether they would support organizations working toward the preservation of an all-white society. Quebec led the way, with 37.2% saying yes, compared to 29.9% in Ontario, 26.4% in British Columbia, and 26.2% in the Atlantic provinces. Nationally, 31.3% of Canadians were willing to tell a total stranger that they would support the kind of groups which their news media regularly liken to Beelzebub.

Does this mean that Canada has more than 7¼ million potential Instauration subscribers? Guess again. The thesis of Jacques Ellul's masterful book Propaganda is that the distance between political conviction and action -- even the smallest action -- is akin to the distance on foot between the two ends of Death Valley on a broiling midsummer's day. Very few modern men and women will act on their convictions unless they are regularly told to do so by several communications media simultaneously. That explains why nearly the only mass demonstrations in the Western world these days are of kinds which the mass media desire -- despite the fact that other masses of people out there have contrary ideas.

The Canadian clone of the Jewish Anti-Defamation League is the League for Human Rights of B'nai B'rith. It is planning a campaign to have the U.S. Library of Congress book classification system amended so that history books it disagrees with are automatically classified as fiction. "We don't want this to be seen as book-burning, because we're very much opposed to censorship," says Alan Shefman, the league's executive director. "But I don't think reclassification would involve censorship."

Rather than plunging in over his head, Shefman is letting his co-religionists at the 10% Jewish University of Toronto test the waters for him. If students there can force chief librarian David Esplin to reclassify works of World War II revisionism against his expressed wishes, then the Jewish Student Unions at Canada's other great diploma mills -- the 26.3% Jewish McGill University in Montreal, the 40.5% Jewish York University in north Toronto, and the 7.5% Jewish University of Manitoba in Winnipeg -- will start making life miserable for their librarians.

A Greek-Canadian philosopher named Alex Michalos has synthesized hundreds of statistics from the years 1964 to 1974 and compiled them in a five-volume, 1,400-page tome which demonstrates that the quality of life is higher in Canada than in the United States. Canadians, who have rather needlessly suffered from a certain inferiority complex vis-à-vis their southern neighbors, are eagerly snapping up the dry North American Social Report, at $25 for the fifth volume alone.

Michalos identified differences on social indicators like the rate of venereal disease and the extent of racial conflict, and awarded points on that basis. Canada wound up with 884, the United States with 775. And, says the author, the Canadians would have scored higher had he not "consciously biased" the scoring by giving every social indicator the same weighting, whether it was vital or slightly whimsical.

The Canadians were ahead on all the "life and death stuff," according to the former Cleveland native, who recently traded his white ethnic and black neighbors for the Anglo-Saxons and Scots of Guelph, Ontario. Michalos gave the best reasons he could for his more controversial point awards. For instance, the higher percentage of Americans believing in a Devil was scored as a minus because to believe in "a thoroughly evil yet logical being is mush-headed." On the other hand, and rather too generously, the greater number of Americans believing in a Great Horned Hitler was disregarded.

Britain. An Irish judge recently told one of his Republic's top criminals that he could retain his freedom by sailing for Britain with his wife and three children. Uncle Paddy would even pick up their fares. The London Daily Mail nearly choked: "if it were ever to degenerate into a contest, we could swamp them" with villains -- "many, no doubt, with bona fide Irish family connections."

On the same day an article by Andrew Alexander alerted Mail readers to the connection between immigration's "massive alteration of British identity" and several other ongoing assaults upon their precious heritage. "Schools and colleges with traditions which often stretch back hundreds of years have vanished, or been submerged in the flood of comprehensivisation [?], supposed to raise standards and, in fact, doing the opposite." Meanwhile, the expression "faith of our fathers" was being drained of any meaning by the witless trendiness of the bishops. Perhaps worst of all, townscapes and landscapes everywhere were being savaged by increasingly distant and unfeeling developers. Today, "no fine building seems safe."

In sum, "Our capacity to relate the present to the past is under systematic attack. The importance of this capacity cannot be over-rated." Thomas Hardy extolled the timeless quality of Egdon Heath. The mere awareness of its endurance, he wrote, gave "ballast to the mind" in times of uncertainty. That, concluded Alexander, is what Britons are really jettisoning on many fronts: "the ballast in people's minds." At the same time, they, like Americans, were being exposed to "wild fantasies, like the TV series 'Roots.'" Quite understandably, their morale and self-confidence were collapsing. Alexander's solution: "Do not just moan about it, do not just seek refuge in nostalgia. Resist!"

White activists in Britain are infuriated when they see countless exhibits devoted to the black, Jewish and Asiatic "contributions" to their island. A group called the British Nationalist and Socialist Movement is determined to alter the score. They are asking local authorities in Manchester, Liverpool and four other darkening cities for grants to set up "white cultural centers." Mr. Paul Rothwell, the group's press officer, says the centers will provide whites -- who are now a minority like any other in many British locales -- with literature and instruction on their racial and cultural background. Nonwhites would be welcome to participate if they did so respectfully. Up to £10,000 in funds have been requested for each center.

Northern Ireland. The most important date in modern Ulster history was 1978. That was the first year when more children were apparently born to Catholic parents than to Protestants. The total population is still officially 62% Protestant, but a door-to-door canvasser was shot dead in Catholic Londonderry during last year's census, which tended to diminish his colleagues' dedication to accuracy.

Ulster was 80% Protestant only a century ago, but differential fertility -- the most unsung political force on earth -- has favored the Catholics ever since. Today, it favors them more than ever. Ulster Protestants have only 14 live births per 1,000 people per year, while Ulster Catholics have 21. The death rates are 13 and 9, respectively. Thus Rev. Ian Paisley's cause and democracy are "radically incompatible," as Rabbi Meir Kahane recently said of Zionism and democracy. Kahane is clever enough to grasp that one cannot have baby-booming minorities and majority rule (or even Majority majorityhood) for long.

Democracy is also incompatible with long-term white racial survival in Britain itself. Imported stocks have outbred and will continue to outbreed the natives. The British radical right, which Paisley seems to scorn, realizes this. Perhaps someday the Ulster leader will stop pretending.

Many young Ulster Protestants have already made their peace with the demographic reality. Says one: "Inevitably, there will be a Catholic majority in the north within my lifetime. People my age had better begin to adjust to the idea." Like white Protestants the world over, he has been taught to "adjust" to his group's decline, not to reverse it.

Belgium. Ex-King Leopold III was a European monarch who did not hightail it to safer pastures in Britain or America during World War II. In fact, he surrendered his army to the Germans after Belgium was overrun, a sensible and life-saving act for which he was never forgiven by the ghoulish Allied statesmen who demanded that all Europeans either run from the Nazis or fight them in the underground. Otherwise, they were likely to be classified as Nazis themselves and after the war treated and tortured as such. For his great sin Leopold was forced to abdicate in 1951 in favor of his son, Baudouin. Whereupon he became a nonperson. A few months ago Leopold, now 80, broke his 30-year silence to object to a television docudrama which accused him of trying to keep a collaborationist Belgian newspaper alive after the editor had quit in protest against increasing German editorial intervention. In a letter to the Belgian government, Leopold said the report was a complete fabrication. Having gotten this off his chest, he promised he would return to his policy of silence unto death.

France. At 10:00 P.M. on April 29, a French autorail had barely left on its scheduled run from Marseilles to Aix when the engineer was obliged to bring the train to a screeching halt to avoid running into some stone blocks on the tracks. When the train had stopped, a dozen "youths," which is what the French call young Algerians and what the U.S. media call young Negro hooligans, climbed into one of the passenger cars and began to harass the terrified passengers. After dispossessing the voyagers of their possessions, the vandals cut the air and water tubes connecting the cars. A second autorail sent to repair the damage came under a hail of rocks before the "youths" melted into the night. The "Great Train Robbery" had taken place near a huge immigrant transit camp on the outskirts of Marseille.

Middle East. To what extent can Arab disunity be traced to Israeli divide-and-conquer tactics? The evidence is clearest in the case of Lebanon. One important piece of the puzzle recently fell into place for the English-speaking world when a courageous Palestinian Jewess named Livia Rokash, now living in Italy, published her book Israel's Sacred Terrorism. It includes revelatory passages from the diary of Moshe Sharett. These cover the period when he was Israel's foreign minister and prime minister, and detail how Israel worked actively to "balkanize" Lebanon by setting the nation's religious groups against one another.

On February 27, 1954, Prime Minister David Ben Gurion observed in a letter to Sharett that "Lebanon is the weakest link in the Arab League," and that its Maronite Christians could be maneuvered to "proclaim a Christian state" and "bring about a radical change." The time was ripe for such a state, but it could arise only with Israel's "initiative and vigorous aid." No amount of money should be spared, said Ben Gurion, to produce an internal rupture in the peaceful land.

Sharett's reply, dated March 10, noted that there was no movement within Lebanon to divide the stable Christian-Moslem state which then existed. But if there was any hope at all for success, he would certainly favor the idea of "actively aiding any manifestation of agitation in the Maronite community tending to strengthen its isolationist tendencies." The plan must be kept secret, however. Otherwise, "the damage which we shall suffer . . . would not be compensated even by an eventual success of the operation itself."

At a May 16, 1954, joint meeting of senior Defense and Foreign Affairs officials, the project began to take shape. From Sharett's diary:

According to him [Moshe Dayan], the only thing that's necessary is to find an officer, even just a major. We would either win his heart or buy him with money to make him agree to declare himself the savior of the Maronite population. Then the Israeli army will enter Lebanon, will occupy the necessary territory and will create a Christian regime which will ally itself with Israel. The territory from the Litani southward will be totally annexed to Israel and everything will be all right. If we were to accept the advice of the chief of staff we would do it tomorrow . . . I agreed to set up a joint committee composed of officials of the Foreign Affairs Ministry and the Army to deal with Lebanese affairs.

On May 28, Sharett wrote: "The chief of staff supported a plan to hire a [Lebanese] officer who will agree to serve as a puppet so that the Israeli army may appear as responding to his appeal to liberate Lebanon from its Muslim oppressors." Sharett next referred to a commission charged with overseeing "prudent actions directed at encouraging Maronite circles who reject Muslim pressures and agree to lean on us."

Author Livia Rokash believes that the first of these "prudent actions" occurred on September 22, 1954, when a bus was mysteriously attacked in Galilee, killing two and wounding ten. Moshe Dayan demanded immediate reprisals across the Lebanese border, despite its total peacefulness since Israel's creation. There must be no preliminary investigation of the bus incident, he said. Sharett vetoed this particular action, but in the ensuing quarter century the "plot against Lebanon" deepened, and the Israelis eventually found their major, Saad Haddad.

The latest Israeli invasion of Lebanon -- the bloodiest so far -- had nothing to do with Israel's security, but everything to do with Israel's Drang nach Norden worked out way back in 1954.

Egypt. In 1953 Anwar Sadat, Israel's future best friend, was asked by a Cairo newspaper what he would say in a letter to Hitler if a report that Der Führer were living incognito in Brazil proved to be true. Sadat wrote the "resurrected" Hitler as follows:

I congratulate you with all my heart because, though you appear to have been defeated, you were the real victor, you were able to sow dissension between Churchill, the "old man," and his allies on the one hand and their ally, the devil, on the other . . . I think you made some mistakes, such as opening too many fronts on Ribbentrop's short-sightedness in the face of Britain's "old man" diplomacy. But you are forgiven on account of your faith in your country and people. That you have become immortal in Germany is reason enough for pride. And we should not be surprised to see you again in Germany, or a new Hitler in your place.

Anwar Sadat

According to Sadat's autobiography, Revolt on the Nile, he once wanted to do a Beginesque shtick by blowing up "the British Embassy and everybody in it." His leader, Nasser, dissuaded him.

Just about everyone in Egypt knew that Sadat was a political chameleon, so just about no patriotic Egyptian or Arab showed up at his funeral. But Menahem was there, with Jimmy, Jerry and Dick.

South Africa. Lothrop Stoddard wrote in 1920, "If there be one truth which history has proved, it is the solemn truth that those who work the land will ultimately own the land." Right now, it must seem to many Afrikaners that Jewish interlopers own the land which the Boertrekkers settled and developed, while Bantu interlopers (whose entry from the north followed theirs from the Cape) work it. The Afrikaner is being squeezed in a tightening vise between big capital and labor interests which share an utter disregard for his future. Harry Oppenheimer's control of the mammoth mining cartels is unyielding from above, even as the Afrikaners -- plagued by a plummeting birthrate -- are being forced to yield more and more jobs below to the exploding black population.

Back in the 1920s, World Communism (as it was then) formally and forcefully sided with South Africa's white laborers against the white bosses and their black allies. The white workingman was called "the hope of the future," and permitting blacks to undercut his living standard was considered a dirty capitalist ploy. Even as National Socialism was rearing its head on the world stage, the Communist and democratic socialist movements were committed to not terribly different racial policies. But a race is like an individual: when it suffers a prolonged bum streak, and cannot pull out of the skid, the whole world eventually turns against it. Consider the plight of the white South African worker:

South African Digest, the overseas propaganda arm of the Nationalist government, regularly reprints editorials like the one recently taken from the South African Sugar Journal. "This is South Africa," it proudly proclaimed:

The progress made to date by South Africa's black people is significant. Five percent of the country's white families now have a smaller disposable income than the average urban black family and within five years the proportion is expected to reach 15 per cent.

Of all the troops protecting South Africa's borders, more than 20 per cent are black or brown.

Between 1970 and 1978 the income of blacks, Coloureds and Asians outside the agricultural sector rose by 40 per cent while white incomes dropped by 3 per cent.

And so the recitation continued. The facts were clearly a source of pride to the well-off whites who had assembled them. One must consider, however, the stark poverty of all Africa's blacks relative to any white, Northern European population on earth. What is being said here is that 5%, and soon 15%, of white families will have disposable incomes below not the well-to-do blacks but the average urban black family.

Blacks have not taken over in South Africa, but the tragedy of Gresham's Law is unfolding nonetheless. The nation's top 600 business leaders are oblivious to its operation. They gathered last November with Prime Minister P.W. Botha, and encouraged him to put short-term economic development before all other considerations. Harry Oppenheimer was naturally allowed to speak first. "Let us look at the leading facts," he said. These were that, despite the black homelands policy, the number of urban blacks had leapt from 1.75 million to 9 million in the past generation. In less than 20 years, it would certainly rise past 20 million. This would have been the place for Oppenheimer to appeal for an all-out drive for black birth control and sterilization, and for heavily subsidized white fertility programs. After all, he might have asked, is it fair that black South African women average six or seven children each, while white South African women average two or less? Is it fair that nearly all of those black babies survive, not because of anything their fellow blacks do for them, but because white doctors and farmers provide them with the best possible medical care and nutrition? Shouldn't whites have the right to insist: we will give you these things if you agree to adopt our fertility level -- neither higher nor lower -- but we must withhold them from those of you who want to conduct a breeding contest.

Oppenheimer would have found immense latent sympathy for such a policy initiative, and, given his 80% control of the world diamond trade, and his vast international connections, he could have hoped to see it have a fair hearing. Instead, he made his usual appeal for a new political dispensation which recognizes that the South Africa of the future will be primarily a black man's country. The alternative, he said, would be economic collapse because the new workers and new consumers alike would have black skins.

A South African with an altogether different vision is Mrs. Irene Buchanan of the quiet Natal town of Howick. Her dream is the white homeland of Boeretannia, with no black maids and servants, no Indian shopkeepers, and, if need be, a lower standard of living (though she doubts it).

Mrs. Buchanan is a well spoken and immaculately mannered Scottish immigrant whose rich accent remains after 20 years. The group she co-founded four years ago, called Wake-Up for short, has already published hundreds of different pamphlets. More than a million copies of these were distributed during the early months of 1982 alone. Why a white homeland?

Because a white homeland will remove our unfair black burden, reduce taxes by 80 percent, allow us to run our homeland as we wish, and shut the big red mouth of world opinion.

A lot would have to be surrendered. Mrs. Buchanan sees little hope for her lovely Natal. But much of Cape Province and the Orange Free State, and the core of the Transvaal, might still be salvaged. The South African establishment mercilessly ridicules Mrs. Buchanan and several other white separatists like her, but this genuine Iron Lady manages somehow never to raise her voice. Her vision actually is a very traditional one. According to Paul Johnson, writing in the (London) Times Literary Supplement for March 27, 1981:

[T]he object of [the traditional Boer Calvinist] policy was . . . to isolate and so preserve a unique cultural entity by restricting multiracialism. The Dutch churches did not endorse white supremacy, or even baasskap. They wanted total separation on a territorial basis so that whites would do unskilled work.

Indeed, the Dutch churches had little to do with the foundation of apartheid, which was laid down by governments which looked for spiritual inspiration to Canterbury rather than Geneva; the 1911 Mines and Works Act which legalised the colour bar; the land legislation of 1913 and 1936; the 1927 Act which forbade sex between the races, and the 1938 Act which put Coloured voters on a separate roll. Their moral responsibility only began in 1950 when Dr. Malan rejected the Dutch church's policy of genuine separate development as "impractical." That is the point at which they should have broken with the government, and dissociated themselves from any legislation which embodied supremacy rather than separation. But they did not do so. Instead they found themselves saddled with a hybrid ideological monster which cannot be effectively defended . . .

There may, however, be a way out for the Dutch churches . . . If [the fast-growing black sects] do not fit in with the liberal Christian scheme, they do fit in with the growing black rejection of multiracialism . . . Black Christianity is taking a not-too-dissimilar path to the Dutch churches, when they are true to themselves: protection of their uniqueness and individuality, self-nourishment for their own cultural roots, and a rejection of fusion into an amorphous mass, which is the only solution liberal Christianity has to offer. The way out for the Dutch churches is to recognize this parallelism of aims, and . . . some of their theologians are beginning to do so.

Dr. Gutz

It was another hectic week in the life of America's foremost historian of the Jewish Holocaust. On Wednesday, April 14, twenty demonstrators from the International Committee Against Racism (ICAR) burst into Dr. Arthur Butz's Northwestern University class on Numerical Methods for Engineers. Fortunately, Dr. Butz was away on jury duty. The substitute teacher called in the security guards and lodged a complaint of infringement of academic freedom.

Over the weekend of April 17-18, Dr. Butz participated in a local symposium on the Holocaust. Another impressive participant was Dr. William Lindsey, a chemist for Du Pont in Chicago, whose own research has convinced him of the technical impossibility of the conventional "gas chamber" story. Twenty-five Jewish picketers descended upon the Holiday Inn where the conference was being held, but their belligerency only highlighted by contrast the "air of integrity, level-headedness and total knowledge of his subject" which Dr. Butz projected. Local news coverage of the event was "amazingly objective," according to one participant. Even so, the Holiday Inn management announced a ban on revisionist history conferences in the future.

On Monday, April 19, the ICAR returned to Dr. Butz's classroom. This time his students' patience snapped. A fist-fight broke out, and, as one wit put it, "two burly engineering students demonstrated the errors inherent in dialectical materialism to the protestors." "Get out of our class," a student yelled. "He's giving us a damn good education. He doesn't bring his views into the classroom." But ICAR member Dave Jimenez rejoined, "We have to harass him because his ideas are harassing the working class . . ." The security guards pitched out Jimenez & Co. just as Dr. Butz arrived.

No Amnesty

Polls have shown that 91% of the American people want illegal immigration stopped. So how does Congress respond to the people? The old pols came out with S. 2222 and H.R. 5872, which would amnesty all illegal immigrants who crashed the Rio Grande and other national boundaries before a "given date," as yet unmentioned. It's as if a bank would pardon the bank robber if he stole money before, let's say, 1979.

To stop this nonsense, Rep. Jim Jeffries (R-Kansas) has introduced a Current Resolution "expressing the sense of the Congress that no amnesties will be granted to aliens presently in the U.S." Jeffries plans to get as many signatures as possible and attach the resolution as an amendment to H.R. 5872 when it gets to the House floor.

We'll see what happens. At least it's some comfort to know that some congressmen don't want to turn this country into another Brazil.

Carlson Runs Again

In 1980 Gerald Carlson prided himself as being the most successful Majority activist candidate in the land. Running for the congressional seat of Michigan's 15th District, he won 55% of the vote in the Republican primary and 32% of the vote in the general election, which he lost to William Ford, the establishment's Democratic incumbent. Carlson compares his record with that of Harold Covington, a retired Nazi, who garnered 40% of the vote in a North Carolina primary contest for state attorney general, and with the record of Tom Metzger, who won the Democratic primary for congressman from California's 43rd District with 50.5% of the vote, but only received 13% of the vote in his defeat at the hands of Representative Clair Burgener, the Republican incumbent who outspent him 8 to 1. In pointing to these figures, Carlson skipped over the fact that he took part in a special primary race in 1981 to fill David Stockman's empty seat in Michigan's 4th District and came out a poor fourth in a field of six.

Gerald Carlson

Undaunted and unbowed, Carlson is now hitting the campaign trail again and is running so hard that one would think he was trying out for a part in "Son of Chariots of Fire." Again the scene of action is Michigan's 15th Congressional District. Only this time Carlson is running in the primary as a Democrat. His chief opponent will be his old rival, Congressman William Ford. Carlson explains his switch by pointing out that the district is heavily (80%) Democratic and that a victory in the primary might well lead to the defeat of the Republican candidate in the November election. One drawback, however, is that the 15th went for Reagan in 1980.

The primary is scheduled for August 3, but there may be a postponement due to hitches arising from redistricting. Since Carlson is running in the Detroit suburbs, where there is a depression and not just a recession, he will emphasize the economic issues (if the media will let him). He is opposing higher property taxes and the emergency taxes needed to pay for increased state spending. As for the social issues, he says he is fighting for "equal rights" for white minorities, in which category he includes "the Italians, the Irish, Swedes, Poles, Greeks, Germans, Hungarians and many other European ethnics."

Carlson asserts contributions up to $200 can be made to his campaign without disclosure of the donor, who can claim a tax credit for half of the contribution, as long as the credit does not exceed $50 -- $100 on a joint return. The address of the Carlson for Congress Committee is P.O. Box 476, Wayne, MI 48184.

Christianity versus "Christianity"

A century before Nietzsche, in the Anti-christ, declared that Paul had nailed Jesus back on his own cross and invented his own history of Christian beginnings, Thomas Jefferson used scissors to cut up the Bible and separate the life and teachings of Jesus from Paul's Judeo-"Christianity." Jefferson wrote that the true teachings of Jesus were "as easily distinguished as diamonds in a dung hill."

The inquisitions that, in the name of Christianity, imposed the teachings of Paul on the Northern Europeans did their brainwashing so well that Jefferson, who wrote, "I am a real Christian" had to keep his "real Christianity" secret. The so-called Jefferson Bible was not discovered until 1902 and is still suppressed. The newly published American Christian Bible does much more than make a long suppressed work available. It clearly shows that the words "Nature and Nature's God," as written into the Declaration of Independence by Jefferson, do not refer to the dogmatical monstrosity that Judeo-"Christians" call Yahweh or Jehovah.

The American Christian Bible is a scholarly plus because it reproduces a readable photographic copy of the Jefferson Bible. Equally significant is editor-publisher Erik Holden's commentary. Among other things, Holden believes the American Christian Bible could trigger a "real Christian movement" to counter Judaeo-"Christianity."

Holden is also convinced that traditional Judaism (not merely Zionism) is the mortal enemy of both the teachings of Jesus and the philosophical foundations of the United States as articulated in the Declaration of Independence.

There are Majority members who have given up on Christianity and believe that all versions of it are totally incompatible and even inimical to any American resurgence. Then there are the more practical folk who know you can modify universal religions, but you can't destroy them.

For those who think Christianity can be "saved," turned around and used as a constructive weapon to end the Majority's dispossession, the American Christian Bible is worth a look-see. It may be ordered from The Sovereign Press, 326 Harris Road, Rochester, WA 98579, for $5 postage paid.

California Primary

The number of local politicians in California who have had direct or indirect connections with the Black Panthers, La Raza Unida and other militant minority groups could not be counted on the legs of a centipede. Yet when, in 1980, Klansman Tom Metzger took his seat on the Central Committee of the San Diego County Democratic Party (by virtue of having won the party's primary for the 43rd Congressional District), a howl was raised from the redwoods of Eureka to the truck farms of Calexico. Five months later, Metzger had been removed for espousing "bigotry."

Metzger came back in '82 -- and he brought his friends with him. Besides running for the U.S. Senate in the June 8 Democratic primary, Metzger deliberately contested a Central Committee seat in the 74th State Assembly district. Two of his supporters, Steve and Gloria Packan, were sure of getting on the party's local governing board because they were among only six candidates on the ballot for six Committee seats representing the 80th Assembly district. Meanwhile, in other San Diego area districts, a draftsman named John R. Nilsen, a manager for a pet supply company named Winston Burdage, and a partly disabled paralegal named Donald Musgrove were also campaigning actively on "white survival" platforms. The Los Angeles Times not-too-objectively called it "a scheme to try to infiltrate" the Central Committee. But Metzger denied any "plot." "There's no crazy, funny stuff on my part," he insisted. Everything was upfront and strictly legal. (It is rather the San Diego County Democratic chairman, Floyd Morrow, who's likely doing the scheming, because he knows that kicking out the Packans will test all of his rules-twisting wiles.)

One would have thought that with the Metzger Six on the San Diego Democratic ballot, and folks like William Shockley, John Schmitz and Pete McCloskey contesting the Republican nomination for U.S. Senate, a corporate executive and Los Angeles political pillar like Steve Frank would have been busy decrying "white bigotry." Instead, he singled out the ethnic appeals of Governor Jerry Brown's former welfare boss, Mario Obledo, as "the most blatant" attempt to inject race into a campaign. In his run for governor, Obledo repeatedly spoke about rousing the "sleeping giant" of Hispanic votes. Echoing a familiar theme from Instauration, Frank declared that "those very forces that allegedly are anti-racist are sometimes unconsciously [?] the most racist of all." It was, said Frank, the political establishment which had started the racial trend in the 1970s by "dividing up" everyone [except the Majority] into minority and ethnic committees.

The veteran opinion pollster Mervin Field accused this year's California candidates of ignoring the "real issues" and sidetracking voters with the "phony issue" of race. Phony or not, he added, the old taboos had been shattered and "you're going to hear more about [race]" in the years to come. A Los Angeles Republican activist named Al Zapanta seconded that idea. "The melting pot . . . is disintegrating," he lamented. "Polarization no longer is around income levels; it's along ethnic and racial lines."

Among the polarized candidates was Irv Rubin, national director of the Jewish Defense League and a would-be state legislator. He accused Pete McCloskey of "using the same type of anti-Semitic canards and clichés that Hitler used 40 years ago," and told him in a debate, "the difference between an anti-Semite [meaning McCloskey] and a Nazi is tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum in my mind." McCloskey, like plenty of others before him, found that "to be called an anti-Semite because I put the interests of the United States ahead of Israel . . . seems to me bizarre."

California state Senate President Pro Tem David Roberti (D-Hollywood), responded to these developments rather like an ostrich. "The taboos have been broken . . . and it could get worse. How much worse, I don't know." What we are seeing, he continued, is "the pollution of the [political] center." Somehow, though, all of this was due to "economic uncertainty," to people "personifying" their abstract problems and seeking to "retire to Citadel America." What Roberti neglected to say, but a Los Angeles Herald-Examiner reporter said for him, is that southern California was only recently a celebrated "white Anglo-Saxon stronghold," one which, in a single generation, was transformed into a stewpot of mutually suspicious minorities.

Tom Metzger, a suburban television repairman, did not cause this demographic disaster. Nor is he gleeful about it. He simply has the native sense to disagree with facile observers like Mervin Field, who calls the brave new racial politics of 1982 "a little virus existing in the body politic that has come to the surface and will be slapped down."

Editor's Note: The results of the California primary will be tallied and analyzed in the August issue of Instauration.

Double Standard Denounced

Those of us who have wondered if Americans of Eastern European descent would ever begin fighting back against our society's defamation of them can take heart in an important meeting which occurred on January 13. Representatives of six Eastern European nationalities met that day with two key members of the U.S. Justice Department: Assistant Attorney General Lowell Jensen and Director of the "Office of Special Investigations" (OSI) Allan Ryan. Ryan and his substantial force are paid millions of dollars a year to hunt down and prosecute suspected Axis war criminals living in America while ignoring other war criminals.

The ethnic delegation's leader, Juri Raus, told Ryan, "We demand that if the United States prosecutes war criminals . . . it prosecute all of them," including "communists who participated in the mass murder of Eastern Europeans."

University of Maryland professor Tonu Parming warned that "the manner in which the OSI has handled the cases prosecuted to date has manifested a political dimension and threatens to extend the long arm of Soviet terror into American courts."

Alexandra Shwed, co-president of the Ukrainian Anti-Defamation League, asked Ryan, "Isn't it disturbing to you, as a federal prosecutor, that these trials are becoming trials by press?" Several delegations noted that Ryan, a man grown accustomed to a carte blanche kind of operation, had trouble containing his emotions during the 2½ hour session.

Organizing the Outcastes

American River College in Sacramento, California, is a two-year public college with 22,000 students, founded in 1955, whose main claim to fame may be its newly active White Student Union (WSU). Chief organizer Gregory Withrow, who has assembled 23 members and a much larger body of silent supporters, wants other campuses to follow the WSU lead. He notices that more and more student governments are dominated by a Black Student Union, a Chicano or Mexican Student Union, a Jewish Student Union, a Homosexual Student Union, a Feminist Student Union, a Leftist Student Union of some sort, and unsavory combinations thereof. "Organized minorities are always stronger than unorganized majorities," he adds, especially on campuses, where political activity is limited.

When starting a WSU, cautions Withrow, one may be asked to produce a formal constitution. If so, "copy another racial club's constitution word for word . . . Simply replace the word Jew or black with white." Go to the school paper and other local news media and announce the formation of a WSU chapter. Refer to the national headquarters in Sacramento (Box 41872, Sacramento, CA 95841). Possible activities would include a White Awareness Week, guest speakers, book donations to the library and book sales to students, and a cystic fibrosis fund-raising campaign (this disease usually strikes children of Northern European ancestry). If an impeccable image is established and no wrong is done, yet equal recognition is withheld by the college administration or student government, the case should be reported to Withrow in Sacramento, who will advise on going to either the Federal Office for Civil Rights (OCR), which handles violations of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, or to a Federal Court, for First Amendment violations. All pertinent records should be kept.

Withrow has gained some painful experience in the field. Last September, members of the local Black Student Union (BSU) disrupted one of his meetings, and American River College security personnel confiscated literature and actually handcuffed him. He filed a complaint of discrimination with the OCR. A Jeff Kaliss was handed the investigation. Kaliss recently concluded that mistreatment was "based on political association rather than race . . . [and] First Amendment concerns are not within OCR's jurisdiction." Withrow is considering going to Federal Court. He has tapes of the BSU disruption which could not be played for the OCR, but are admissible in court. He says they will prove that James Williams, the BSU faculty advisor, lied in an interview conducted by the OCR.

Still Healing

It is gratifying to learn that one's best efforts in a chosen field have inspired a worthy and sympathetic response from afar. A man like David Irving, the editor of Focal Point magazine and himself the focal point of controversy on the college lecture circuit, has had precious little reward for 20 years of challenging certain historical prejudices of the English. But the Irish composer Cormac O'Duffy was so moved by Irving's first book, The Destruction of Dresden, that he has created "A Dresden Requiem." Its premier, reported in the Irish newspapers but almost ignored by the British press, was fittingly held in the Coventry (England) Cathedral as the climax of that badly bombed city's Festival of Peace and Reconciliation.

We cannot bring back Dresden's dead, said O'Duffy, nor restore its lost grandeur, but "we can express our genuine sorrow . . . and ask for forgiveness and healing." His sentiments were affirmed by Wing Commander Maurice Smith, present for the occasion, who was "just obeying orders" when he led the senseless raid which killed 100,000 or more people in a single night, while destroying one of the architectural gems of the West. The vanquished Germans had blunders and needless cruelties aplenty of their own to atone for, and have searched their hearts thoroughly. But when the English and Americans are asked to do the same, there is still a lot of emotional resistance. "A Dresden Requiem" will likely remain an artistic rarity for some years to come.

Gunslinging Arab

Ed Fitzgerald, 45, is a family man and a second-grade schoolteacher. But he lives in greater Los Angeles and has found that guard dogs, a $3,200 alarm system and defensive weapons are no longer enough. So he's made The Decision.

Maurice O'Brien, 44, is a private pilot and aerospace engineer whose Irish brogue is untouched by more than twenty years in America. But his wife, mother-in-law and front door have all been badly roughed up -- mugged, mugged and smashed down respectively -- and so he too has made The Decision.

Both men have enrolled in Massad Ayoob's Lethal Force Institute, a travelling gun academy designed to take ordinary civilians up to, and usually beyond, the training levels of big-city cops. Ayoob, a trim, light-skinned, second-generation Syrian American, was firing a pistol by the age of 4. A master combat shooter and international gold medalist, he alone (among 800 entrants) survived a supposedly unsurvivable, computer-controlled pistol course at the Ohio State Police Academy. Ayoob is rarely more than inches from a loaded weapon, but he has a deep respect for the damage a gunfight does to everyone involved. Even the most justified of shootings can lead to years of depression, social withdrawal, insomnia and sexual dysfunction, not to mention a suit from the dead felon's family. That is why The Decision to responsibly undertake advanced survival training must be communicated to Ayoob before he will pass on his tricks.

Ayoob plans to buy his 4-year-old daughter a gun in two years. He knows the stigma of being perceived as a "gunslinging paranoiac," but recognizes that new skills will be needed to meet the threat of a deteriorating society.
